The mountings of the sword are entirely of solid gold. On top of the pommel is a single silver oak leaf and foul anchor, the symbols of the comander's rank, and around the edge are chased thirteen stars, Immediately below and on the front of the hilt are the American eagle and the coat of arms of the District of Columbia, richly chased upon a background of oak leaves. chased upon a background of oak leaves. The guard is formed of dolphins and a beautifully modeled sea nymph chased in full relief; upon the broad portion of the guard is shown the U. S. S. Gloucester, accurately modeled in low relief, and upon the opposite side, in raised letters, "Santiago de Cuba, July 3, 1848."

The scabbard is of black steel damascened in gold with a decoration of dolphins and tridents, and further ornamented by three richly chased solid geld bands, composed of anchors, oak leaves and laurel, the two latter emblematic of strength and victory. Upon the upper band is the monogram "R. W.," and beneath it "U. S. N.," upon the middle band the sings, "ter "W." The ferrule of the "abbard" formed of an arrangement of a ves and acorns, signifying achievement. These are interlaced with dolphins, laurel and anchors.

The blade is of fine steel, with the inscription damascened in gold, and a succession of torpedo boats, suggesting the Furor and Pluton as a fitting ornament.

"The ship seemed to me lost, and I followed the example of the mate, intending to jump overboard with the grating when I to jump overboard with the grating when I could no longer ensure the heat. I had made but a few steps forward through the crowd of excited men when I heard a commanding voice above all the oun and confusion. Turning, I could just distinguish through the smake the tall form of Capt. Wainwright. He moved forward among the excited men, and called through a speaking trumpet. Take your places at fire quarters. He wound tan tans one on the small-der, and call that one by name, always repeating fire quarters. His distinguished bearing and cause, iterless mature and an instantaneous effect on the men, calming the tumuit, restoring confidence, and almost making one assumed of his fears. Farrathe tumuit, restoring confidence, and almost making one assamed of his fears. Farragut was walking at his side, and Lieut. Thornton was industriously placing the men and directing their work. The captain's order was quickly taken up by the men and passed through the ship, so that in a few minutes every man was at his station and doing his best to combat the flames.

"Just at this time a shell exploded in the cabin, starting a fire, which was not discovered until it had made considerable headway. The old ship seemed doomed, and it looked as if only a miracle could save her. She was so hard aground that the engines, with all their power, could afford no rehef; in flames from the water to the masthead from the fire raft; the cabin ablaze from the exploded shell, and the vessel the center of a terrible storm of shot and shell. I overheard a conversation between Capt. Wainwright and Mr. Purdy, who was in charge of the engines. In which the captain ordered Purdy to increase the power of the engine by reducing the water, at the risk of bursting the beller—to do anything to get the vessel afloat. In a few minutes the ship began to jump so that one could scarcely stand on deck; but she came off and came off and

The Enemy's Fleet.

"It was warm work still, but seemed only fun compared with what we had just been through. We continued tiring just the same at anything and everything that did not fly our flag. Our attention was particularly claimed by a large river steamer crowded with soldiers. She was approaching us apparently with the intention of boarding us Capt. Wainwright hailed her and demanded her surrender. We delayed our fire for an answer, and when it came, 'No, never,' a full broadside was our reply, and it sent her drifting ashore in flames. The enemy's fleet was now being worsted at all points. All the vessels seemed anxious to escape to the fort or to the city, except the Manassas, which was making harmless attempts to strike our vessels as they came up. She struck at the Brooklyn and crossed our bow. The admiral signaled the Mississippi, which was directly astern of us, to engage her and run her under. The old Mississippi headed straight for her. Although the Manassas escaped being struck she received a terrible broadside at close range. The Mississippi commenced turning to follow her, pouring a broadside into her at the same time. Seeing no way of escape the Manassas was run alongside the bank, and was set afire by her crew. She soon drifted down the river in flames." Capt. Wainwright hailed her and demande

THE GLOUCESTER'S CAREER.

Distinction in the Santiago Fight an Invasion of Porto Rico.

The Gloucester has had a short but me brilliant career in the naval service D signed as a pleasure yacht, she was co verted into an auxiliary cruiser soon after the outbreak of the Spanish war, and w attached to the naval fleet engaged blockading the ports of Cuba. She was or of the gallant fleet that guarded the er trance of Santiago harbor and took prominent part in the great tattle of Ju 3, 1898, which resulted in the complete d struction of Cervera's fleet and the defe of the Spanish cause. To the Glouceste under the gallant, wise and able direction Lieut. Commander Wainwright, is due th main credit for the annihilation of th much-dreaded torpedo boat destroyers Te ror and Pluton at the very outset of the battle, an achievement, considering all th attending circumstances, not the least which was the supposed inferiority of th quondam pleasure boat, that is without parallel in the naval history of the world.

Entered the Harbor of Guanica. Next to her grand achievement at Sa tiago, the greatest performance of th Gloucester was in entering the harbor-Guanica, Porto Rico, in the van of Ge Miles' expedition. It was a daring undertaking, as it was supposed that the harbor was well protected with torpedoes and sunken mines. Since then the Gloucester's career has been confined to purely utine naval service. She is now at Annapoiis, where she is used by the cadets of the Naval Academy as a practical means of instruction in the art of naval warfare. The accompanying illustration, which was made from a photograph taken in New York harbor, is of more than passing interest, from the fact that it shows her intrepid commander on the bridge, a place where he re-Miles' expedition. It was a daring u
